WHAT WILL YOU DO TOMORROW? / N. Sherman — «Автор»,
2026

What if your dream came true tomorrow? You've imagined this moment hundreds of times: money is no longer a problem, success has become reality, and life finally belongs to you. But have you ever wondered what you'll do the next morning? When the need to struggle, prove yourself, and wait disappears, one question remains—one you may be completely unprepared for: what do you actually want? This book is about the dreams we carry in our heads for years, about the habit of putting life off until later, and about a strange paradox: sometimes the fulfillment of a wish turns out to be harder than the path to it. On these pages, you'll look at your goals differently, check whether they are truly yours, and try to imagine life beyond the long-awaited success. But this is only the beginning. Ahead lies an entire series about the paradoxes of desire, choice, and a life that may turn out to be not at all what you imagined. And if one day you get everything you've ever dreamed of—what then?

Prologue. The Morning After the Dream

Imagine that tonight, something you have thought about for years finally happens. There is an amount of money in your account that once seemed out of reach. People know your name—people whose attention used to exist only in your imagination. You are offered the job you dreamed of. Or perhaps you have gained the most important thing of all: the freedom to manage your time without asking permission or explaining yourself.

The first few minutes feel like a scene from a movie. You check your phone, reread the message, and check it again. Then comes silence. No one tells you what to do next. The day begins like any other: daylight appears outside, you get thirsty, and your phone demands attention. And suddenly, a question you never made room for in your dream appears: what now?

We often imagine the moment of achievement in detail, but almost never the ordinary day that follows. We plan how to enter a new life as if a complete script will automatically appear on the other side of the door. But beyond that door is a space where we still have to make choices.

This book does not begin with advice to try harder. It begins with the pause between wanting and acting. In that pause, you can see that a dream is made up of different things: what you genuinely want; what you hope will impress others; the habit of wanting; and the hope that one day you will finally be given permission to live differently.

You do not need to find the right answer. Imagine that what you wanted has already happened, and do not run away from the morning that follows. Sometimes that morning shows us what we truly want. Tomorrow, you wake up as the person you dreamed of becoming. You no longer have to prove anything to anyone. The day is yours. What will you do first?

1. We're Used to Dreaming About the Finish Line

A dream usually comes to us as an image. We see ourselves in a beautiful home, in another country, onstage, running our own business, or living a life in which we have enough money without constant fear. The image is vivid because doubt, tedious tasks, mistakes, and waiting have already been edited out. It contains the outcome, but not the process.
